Responsibility

For those of us who have been around for a few years, there is always the urge to lament how things have changed. Until now, I have resisted the urge to talk about the good old days. (Maybe that's because I can still remember a few that weren't so good.)

When I was just a wee broth of a lad, my father taught me a great lesson. I don't think he realized it – and at the time I didn't realize it either. We were at the dinner table and my mother said that an individual had called and wanted my dad to do some remodeling. (My dad was a building contractor.) My dad said that he would call him the next day and explain that he couldn't do the job and recommend someone else. My mother asked why and my father's reply "He doesn't keep his word."

Perhaps it really was a different time. One of the greatest compliments you could give a person was "He's a man of his word." When someone said that they would do something, you could depend on them. My father never used contracts, just a handshake.

Of course, that required personal responsibility. Today, it's "Well, it's not my fault." Or, "I'm not responsible." Balderdash! When you agree to do something, do it! Don't whine. Don't complain. Don't make excuses.

There are times we tell someone that we will do something just to make them feel better. "Easing the pain" was the way one psychologist defined it. What we don't realize is the pain that creates when we don't follow through.

Toastmasters is designed to teach use effective public speaking and leadership. There needs to be a third area – responsibility.

When the VP of Education assigns you a role in an upcoming meeting, you have the opportunity to say, "I can't be there." If you don't then, by your actions, you have said "I will be there and I will fill the role to the best of my ability – you have my word."

Having served as VP of Education and having talked to many other who have served in that office, one comment comes above all others. "I have members that I can't depend on – they will agree to a role and then either not show up or show up and say that they are not prepared."

The same thing applies to serving as officers in the Club, Area, Division or District. No one is ever forced to accept a position. When you do accept a position, treat it like a role in a club meeting. Just do it. If you aren't willing to do the job – don't accept it. There is no shame in saying, "I would rather not." There is shame in accepting the role and then not doing it."

New Years is over, but it's not too late to make your word your bond.
